THIS REGISTER and the accompanying brief Historical Memoranda have been prepared by an officer of the Regiment for circulation among his brother officers of the organization, to commemorate the deeds they have done, the hardships they have endured, the associations they have formed, and the stirring scenes — some pleasant, many sad—through which they have passed, during four years of service together under the old flag.

HISTORICAL MEMORANDA.

HISTORICAL MEMORANDA.

THE Eleventh Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers was originally organized under the official designation of "Harlan's Light Cavalry." It was raised as an independent regiment during the months of August and September, 1861, by Colonel Josiah Harlan, of Philadelphia, under special authority from the Secretary of War. Under this authority companies were raised in different States, Company A being from Iowa, portions of Companies E and F from New York, a part of Company I from New Jersey, Company M from Ohio, and the remainder of the regiment from Pennsylvania. The organization of the regiment was completed on the 5th of October, 1861, by the muster-in of the Field and Staff at Washington, the place of general rendezvous. Its strength consisted of 41 officers and 1089 enlisted men. The regiment having been assigned to Brigadier-General I. N. Palmer's brigade, marched on the sixteenth of October from Camp Harlan, on Seventh Street, to Camp Palmer, near Ball's Cross Roads, where it went into camp for instruction and drill.

It having been ascertained at this time that Congress had only authorized the raising of regiments by States, and that consequently the formation of Harlan's Light Cavalry as an independent regiment was irregular, it was attached to the Pennsylvania State organization on the thirteenth of November, and received the official designation it now retains.

Considerable progress was made in foot and mounted drill at Camp Palmer notwithstanding unfavorable weather and location. On the seventeenth of November the regiment broke up camp and marched for Annapolis, from which point it proceeded by transports to Camp Hamilton, near Fortress Monroe. Here stables and quarters were built, and during a period of six months a thorough course of instruction and drill was followed, and some experience acquired in scouting and picket duty.

The tactics of 1841 were taught until February 27, 1862, when Cook's system of single-rank formation was adopted, and the regiment thoroughly instructed in squadron drill and some of the regimental evolutions. On the eleventh of April the tactics of 1841 were again adopted. At the commencement of the spring campaign the regiment was as efficient in squadron drill, general instruction, and condition of men and horses, as any regiment in the service.

In March Companies M and C, under Major Runyan, were detached and ordered to Newport News for duty under General Mansfield. On the fifteenth of May Companies A, E, G, H, and L, under Lieutenant-Colonel Spear, were detached and sent to Portsmouth, Virginia, and a few weeks afterward to Suffolk, being replaced at Portsmouth by Company M, Captain Reynolds, from Newport News.

The remaining five companies of the regiment, under Colonel Harlan, were ordered to the Army of the Potomac, at the White House, in the beginning of June, and remained in that vicinity until the evacuation of the place, toward the end of the month, when they removed to Williamsburg. In August the command was stationed for a few days at Burut Ordinary, and was then ordered to Suffolk, at which place it rejoined the other five companies on the twentieth of August. The service of these five companies while on the Peninsula consisted in picket and scouting duty in the rear of McClellan's army. Colonel Harlan commanded until July fifteenth, and Major George Stetzel from that time until a few days prior to the departure of the command for Suffolk, when Lieutenant-Colonel Spear assumed command of the regiment.

The five companies at Suffolk, at first under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Spear and afterward of Major Wetherill, were meantime on active duty. Companies A and E, under Captain Stratton, were engaged in scouting and the topographical survey of the country toward the Blackwater, under the immediate direction of Brigadier-General Mansfield, then in command at Suffolk. The other companies were principally employed in picket duty.

Colonel Harlan having been mustered out of service on the nineteenth of August, Lieutenant-Colonel Spear was commissioned as his successor. The regiment remained here nearly a year engaged in picket, scouting, and patrol duty. Almost daily reconnoissances were made to the Blackwater by company, squadron, or battalion, and frequent skirmishes and engagements with the enemy took place. On the second of December a battalion, under Major Stratton, made a saber charge, at Beaver Dam Church, against a superior force of the enemy's cavalry, completely routing it, capturing twenty-five prisoners and a section of the celebrated rocket battery taken from McClellan on the Peninsula. This charge fully demonstrated the superiority of our cavalry over that of the enemy, and the effectiveness of the saber as the true cavalry weapon. The regiment was armed at this time with sabers and revolvers, and eight or ten Sharp's carbines to each company. During this and the many subsequent engagements and victories of the regiment, until near the close of the campaign of 1864, the saber was the principal weapon employed, and was always successful against an equal force of cavalry. Its constant and effective use inspired the officers and men with confidence and bravery, and a saber charge by an advance guard of the Eleventh never failed to promptly clear the roads of the enemy's pickets or advance.

On the 30th of January, 1863, the regiment took a prominent part in the defeat of the Rebel General Pryor, at the battle of the Deserted House, during which several successful saber charges were made. An attack was made on the enemy's works at Franklin on the seventeenth of March, in which two battalions, under Majors Stratton and Cornog, attempted to carry the works by a mounted charge. In one of these charges the lamented Lieutenant Mowday fell.

Company M, having been relieved at Norfolk by Company F, rejoined the regiment about the twentieth of March. During the siege of Suffolk by Longstreet, from April eleventh to May third, the regiment was actively employed. Companies B, L, and M, and two companies of another regiment, under Major Stratton, were stationed at South Mills, on the Dismal Swamp Canal, thirty miles below Norfolk, as an outpost, guarding the approach from that direction. The remaining companies at Suffolk were prominent in the operations before that place, and captured many prisoners during the pursuit which followed the raising of the siege. In the early part of May the regiment was employed, with other forces, in taking up the railroad track from Suffolk to Franklin, during which operation several engagements occurred, resulting in the defeat of the enemy.

During the year's service at Suffolk the regiment constantly scouted over the whole country on the left bank of the Blackwater and Chowan Rivers, from the James River to Albemarle Sound, in North Carolina, keeping the country clear of the enemy, capturing many prisoners and considerable property. It is estimated that each company marched an average of three hundred miles per month during this period. Stables and quarters had been built early in the fall, and the horses, protected, when not on duty, from the inclemency of the weather, were in fine condition. Meeting with no disaster, the regiment arrived at a high state of discipline, and became very effective in men and material.

The three companies at South Mills rejoined the regiment on the fourth of June. On the twenty-first of the same month the regiment marched to Portsmouth, and there embarked on transports for White House, on the Pamunkey River. Company F, under Captain Mitchell, having been relieved at Norfolk, rejoined the regiment at Portsmouth. Landing at White House, a rapid march brought the command, on the twenty-sixth, to the Virginia Central Railroad bridge over the South Anna River, near Hanover Court House. The enemy's works were immediately attacked in the rear by a mounted and dismounted charge, and carried with little loss, resulting in the capture of one hundred and twenty-five prisoners. During the expedition the Rebel Brigadier-General W. H. F. Lee was captured, and also seven hundred horses and mules, eighty wagons, and other property. After the destruction of the bridge the regiment returned to White House. Through the fault of the officer in command no attempt was made to destroy the upper bridge, three miles distant, on the Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad, in consequence of which another expedition, under Brigadier-General Getty, consisting of seven thousand infantry and artillery, with the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, started from White House on the first of July to destroy the bridge, and thus complete the severance of railroad communication between Richmond and Lee's army, then near Gettysburg. The expedition failed in its main object, but on the night of the fourth of July Companies G and M, under Major Stratton, destroyed the railroad bridge, station, and public property at Ashland. The regiment returned to White House on the seventh, and a few days afterward marched to Hampton, thence proceeded by transports to Portsmouth, and on the thirteenth went into camp at Bower's Hill, seven miles out on the Suffolk Road.

On the sixteenth of July, Colonel Spear having been placed in command of the brigade, the command of the regiment devolved upon Major Wetherill. He was succeeded on the twenty-second of August by Lieutenant-Colonel Stetzel, who retained command until July of the following year. From the twenty-fifth of July to the second of August the regiment, in connection with the First New York Mounted Rifles, made a raid into North Carolina by the way of Winton, for the purpose of destroying the railroad bridge at Weldon. Finding the enemy strongly posted in superior force at Jackson, an attack was made, but failing to dislodge him, the command retired, after a short engagement. About forty prisoners and one hundred horses were captured. The failure of this raid was caused by the slowness of the march, which did not exceed twenty-five miles per day, and gave the enemy time to concentrate. The delay was mainly owing to the neglect to provide horse artillery instead of the mounted battery which accompanied the expedition.

Soon after the return from this expedition the regiment went into camp at Camp Getty, three miles from Portsmouth, constructed stables and huts, and resumed drill, which had been nearly suspended for eighteen months. In October the regiment went on an expedition, by water, to Matthews County, Virginia, for the purpose of suppressing contraband trade, and returned at the end of eight days. Several expeditions by the entire command and by battalions were made in the fall and early winter to the Blackwater and the northeastern part of North Carolina, but without important results, except clearing the country of guerrillas and destroying the contraband traffic.

The orders from the War Department authorizing men to re-enlist were published in October of this year, and during that and the five following months four hundred "veterans" enrolled themselves for three years additional service. These veterans comprised the best material in the organization, and their ranks afterward furnished nearly all the officers and non-commissioned officers of the regiment for the hard-fought campaigns of the subsequent years.

On the 23d of January, 1864, the regiment left Portsmouth for Williamsburg, at which place it remained until the eighth day of April, when it returned to Portsmouth. At Williamsburg stables and huts were again constructed, and all the time available from duty in the field was employed in perfecting the drill. Early in February Brigadier-General Wistar's celebrated expedition for the surprise and capture of Richmond was made. The Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry composed part of the forces, it having been sent to Williamsburg with that object in view, although ostensibly for the purpose of enrolling the inhabitants of the country. The expedition proceeded no farther than Bottom's Bridge. Its failure, although immediately owing to information conveyed to the enemy by a deserter, was mainly due to the long time employed in its preparation. Several other expeditions were made by the regiment while it was stationed at Williamsburg, but no important results were accomplished. Company G, Captain Skelley, was detached in February for duty on the Eastern Shore of Virginia.

After returning to Portsmouth active preparations were made for the spring campaign. Brigadier-General August V. Kautz took command of the cavalry division, composed of the Eleventh Pennsylvania, First District of Columbia, Third New York, and Fifth Pennsylvania regiments. As long raids into the heart of the enemy's country were contemplated, everything possible was done to make the outfit complete and reduce the transportation to the smallest limit. The strength of the division was nearly three thousand effective men. Commencing its March on the fifth of May, the division reached the Weldon Railroad, in the vicinity of the Nottoway River, on the seventh, and on the following day a part of the division destroyed the Stony Creek Bridge, while the Eleventh, assisted by the First District of Columbia Cavalry, charged and drove back a regiment of Rebel infantry guarding the railroad bridge over the Nottoway, burned the bridge, and on the same day defeated the enemy at Jarrett's Station. From there the command proceeded direct to City Point, where it arrived on the evening of the tenth, having marched three hundred miles in six days. The loss of the regiment during the raid was one man killed, and Lieutenant Prudhomme and ten men wounded.

On the eleventh, Companies B and H, under Captain Roberts, were detached for service at Headquarters of the Eighteenth Corps. Without waiting to rest, the division crossed to Bermuda Hundred on the eleventh, and moved out for another expedition the next day, from the Bermuda front, the rebel lines having been broken for the purpose by our infantry columns. The Danville Railroad was struck the same night at Coalfield, twelve miles from Richmond, and was the line of march the following day as far as the Nottoway. At Flat Creek Bridge a sharp engagement took place on the fourteenth, in which Lieutenant Shriver was killed. The enemy being too strongly posted to be dislodged without heavy loss, the command retired from that point and struck across to the South Side Railroad, and thence by a circuitous route, by the way of Lawrence, Jarrett's Station, and Sussex Court House, to City Point, arriving on the seventeenth. During this expedition the command destroyed a large amount of railroad track on the Danville, South Side, and Weldon Railroads, and a large quantity of Rebel government property, including station buildings, locomotives and cars, and warehouses filled with stores. The regiment marched a distance of nearly three hundred miles in six days. Its losses were one officer and five men killed, and eight men wounded.

The division encamped near Bermuda Hundred until May twenty-eighth, when it was placed on dismounted duty in the line of works in front of that place. On the ninth of June, after a rapid march to the rear of Petersburg, on the Jerusalem Plank Road, the division made an attack, carried the works, capturing one gun and fifty prisoners, and entered the edge of the town. General Gilmore, with a large force of infantry and artillery, having been ordered to make a feint on the main works, four miles to the right, failed to do so with sufficient energy to hold the enemy, who moved heavy reinforcements to oppose the attack of our cavalry, which was then withdrawn without accomplishing the main object of the expedition, the destruction of the railroad bridge over the Appomattox. In these operations the Eleventh bore a conspicuous part, and suffered considerable loss. On the sixteenth the regiment took part on the left in the attack which resulted in the capture of the main line of works around Petersburg. Company B, having been relieved from duty with the Eighteenth Corps, rejoined the regiment on the twentieth.

From the twenty-first to the thirtieth of June the regiment was engaged in the raid of Kautz's and Wilson's divisions, having for its object the destruction of the Danville Railroad. The command, nearly ten thousand strong, moved out from the rear of the Petersburg lines to the South Side Railroad, and along the line of that road to Burkesville Junction. From that point the march turned southwesterly along the Danville Road as far as the Staunton River. At the bridge over that stream Kautz's division, on the twenty-fifth, made a strong demonstration against the enemy, who was well posted on the right bank. In this attack the regiment lost one of its best officers, Captain Reynolds, who fell in the beginning of the engagement. Major Ackerly was severely wounded. Owing to the natural strength of the position no general attack was made, and the command commenced its return march during the night. Thus far all had been success. Several stations, and considerable track and other property had been destroyed on the South Side Railroad, while for a distance of thirty miles on the Danville Road the destruction was complete, scarcely a vestige of a railroad being left excepting the earthwork. No more effective operation of the kind has been accomplished by cavalry during the war. In returning, a strong force of the enemy's infantry and cavalry was encountered at Stony Creek on the night of the twenty-eighth, and at Ream's Station on the twenty-ninth, and heavy engagements took place, in which both divisions suffered severely. The battle on the twenty-ninth lasted from early in the morning until two o'clock in the afternoon, when the command was obliged to retreat by a circuitous route, abandoning most of its artillery and material. In a charge of the Eleventh on the last day, many brave and gallant officers and men fell. The loss of the regiment in this raid amounted to one hundred and thirty in killed, wounded, and missing. Among the killed were many of the best officers of the regiment. Captains Reynolds, Loomis, and Bailey, and Lieutenant Tears were killed, and Captain Roberts mortally wounded. Major Ackerly was severely wounded, Surgeon Harlan captured, and Lieutenant Barclay wounded and captured. For rapidity of march and endurance of the men this raid has not been excelled during the war, nearly five hundred miles having been marched in ten days, including the time engaged in fighting.

The regiment was in camp at Jones's Neck, on the James River, during July, engaged in refitting. On the fourteenth, Company L was detached to relieve Company G, on the Eastern Shore of Virginia, the latter company rejoining the regiment soon after. Lieutenant-Colonel Stetzel having been assigned to the command of the dismounted camp of the division on the sixteenth, Major Stratton assumed command of the regiment, which he retained, with the exception of a short interval, until the regiment was mustered out of service. The division having been attached to General Sheridan's forces, constituted a part of the fifteen thousand cavalry with which he successfully engaged the enemy at Deep Bottom on the twenty-ninth

On the thirty-first, the regiment moved across the Appomattox, and was placed on picket duty at Lee's Mills, on the extreme left of the army, and on the third of August, at Mount Sinai Church, at the left rear. From the eighteenth to the twenty-fifth the regiment was engaged in all those important and hard-fought actions by means of which the Weldon Railroad was finally occupied and held by our forces. Skirmishes were had on the nineteenth, and in the attack by the enemy on the twenty-first the regiment held the left of the line. On the evening of the twenty-first and on the twenty-second the regiment was engaged in heavy skirmishing, and on the twenty-third a considerable engagement ensued near Ream's Station, in each of which operations the regiment suffered some loss. The next day considerable skirmishing again occurred, and on the twenty-fifth the regiment was engaged all day on the extreme left in the hard-fought and sanguinary battle of Ream's Station, in which our forces, under General Hancock, although driven out of their works toward the close of the day, ultimately held their ground. In this battle Lieutenant Neilson was killed. After this the regiment returned to Mount Sinai Church, and remained on duty in that vicinity, picketing the rear lines of the army, until the twenty-eighth of September, when it returned to Jones's Neck. Company H, having been relieved from duty with the Eighteenth Corps, rejoined the regiment on that day.

In the beginning of this year's campaign two hundred Merrill's carbines had been issued to the regiment, and in August a considerable number of Sharp's, Burnside's, and Starr's were added for temporary use. The Merrill's carbine did not prove to be an effective weapon, and the diversity in the arms of the regiment was very objectionable. Major Stratton had early in the year made an effort to properly arm the regiment with the celebrated Spencer carbines, but the deficiency in the supply delayed their arrival until this time. The carbines arrived at the camp of the regiment at two o'clock in the morning of the twenty-ninth of September. The command was under orders to march at daylight on an important expedition, and the men were entirely unused to this complicated repeating carbine. Yet with confidence in that pre-eminent skill which the American soldier has so often exhibited, the arms were issued, the men briefly instructed in their use, and the command was on the march at daylight.

In this movement across the James the enemy's left was turned, and an attempt made on the night of the twenty-ninth to surprise and enter Richmond from the north, while the infantry made the attack on the Fort Harrison side. The fort was taken, but the night attack of the cavalry failed, owing to the troops losing their way in the darkness. The loss in this expedition was small. During the seven days following the cavalry was constantly employed in skirmishing with the enemy, and several considerable engagements took place. The division, at this time reduced to one thousand effective men, was pushed out on the extreme right flank of the army, three miles from the infantry support. On the morning of the seventh of October the position was turned, and enveloped by a force of the enemy from five to seven thousand strong, and after a contest of several hours' duration the command was driven back, with the loss of its artillery. In this engagement the regiment suffered considerably in killed and wounded, and a number were taken prisoners. Major Titus and Lieutenant Barber were wounded and captured, and Captain Bacon and Lieutenant Beers captured. This disaster resulted solely from the faulty position in which the division had been placed by the general in command of the Army of the James. Lieutenant-Colonel Stratton having been slightly wounded in the action of the seventh, the command of the regiment soon after devolved upon Major Skelley, who remained in command until the twenty-second of November, when the former officer again assumed command. During the remainder of October the regiment was engaged in picket duty on the extreme right of the army, and had several skirmishes with the enemy, in one of which Lieutenant Banks was severely wounded. It also took active part in the engagements of the thirteenth and twenty-seventh of the month, during General Butler's attempts to turn the enemy's left, but did not sustain much loss.

In November the regiment went into camp in the rear of the lines, two miles north of the James, where it remained during the winter, reorganizing, refitting, and drilling. During the fall about four hundred of the officers and men had been mustered out upon the expiration of their term of service, and the regiment reorganized by the appointment of officers and non-commissioned officers, and the addition of recruits. At this camp stables and quarters were again built, and the regiment completely fitted out with everything necessary to make it effective. During the winter the command was thoroughly drilled, and became more proficient in regimental evolutions than, probably, any regiment of cavalry in the army. Large details for picket duty were furnished for the right of the line, and several expeditions of minor importance were sent out.

On the tenth of December a demonstration was made against the right of our line by a heavy force, and a considerable engagement took place, the enemy retiring at nightfall. The Eleventh held the right of the line at New Market Heights during the attack, and sustained a loss of several men killed and wounded. Captain Tripp received a severe wound in this affair. In February, 1865, the regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Stratton, made an expedition into Surrey and Isle of Wight Counties, for the purpose of intercepting a rebel force expected there, but no enemy appearing, the expedition returned, after five days' hard marching.

Toward the close of March, Brevet Major-General Kautz was relieved of the command of the cavalry division by Brigadier-General Ranald S. Mackenzie. On the evening of the twenty-eighth of the month the division broke up camp, crossed the James and Appomattox Rivers, and by night of the second day following had reached the left of the army, at Ream's Station; thence to follow the fortunes and share the victories of Sheridan's command during the short but brilliant campaign culminating in the surrender of Lee, at Appomattox Court House.

At the battle of the Five Forks, on the first of April, the regiment had the advance of the division, which was ordered to attack on the extreme right of Sheridan's forces. Soon after passing Dinwiddie Court House, the enemy's infantry was found strongly posted in the edge of a wood along the White Oak Road, about two miles to the right of the Five Forks. A mounted and dismounted charge was immediately made by the Eleventh, and the enemy driven from his position in confusion. His strength was afterward ascertained to have been just double the number of our men engaged in the attack. This triumph was not achieved without heavy loss. Major Munroe and Captain Lancaster were killed, Lieutenant Matthews mortally wounded, Lieutenant Wolfe captured, and several men killed and wounded. The division, following up this flank attack, closed in to the left, and, moving on the right of the Fifth Corps, swept round with it to the enemy's rear, in the final movement of the day, which resulted in the capture of ten thousand prisoners. The Eleventh bore its full share in this movement, and captured many of the enemy.

During the next three days the cavalry followed in vigorous pursuit of the enemy, and frequent engagements occurred. On the fourth of April the Eleventh Regiment, having the advance, attacked the enemy's rear guard, strongly posted at Deep Creek, and, after an hour's engagement, assisted by a small portion of the division, gained the position. The enemy's loss is known to have been twenty killed and wounded, including one colonel and another officer killed, while but two men of the Eleventh were slightly wounded. Toward night the cavalry outposts of Lee were found two miles from Amelia Court House, at which place his main army was halted. A charge was immediately made, and the rebel cavalry driven back upon the support of the main force. The position thus gained was held during the night. The following day a considerable engagement was had with a large force of the enemy on the railroad below Amelia Court House, but with no decisive results. The object and effect of these attacks were to delay the enemy by bringing him to engagements, while other troops were making forced marches to intercept his retreat. In each of these affairs the regiment suffered a small loss. On the sixth the division moved to Burkesville, and the next day to Prince Edward's Court House, where a number of prisoners were captured. By this movement the command passed from the extreme right to the extreme left of Sheridan's army. The division having become much reduced in numbers, was on the seventh reorganized as a brigade, Brigadier-General Mackenzie retaining command. On the eighth the march was pushed to Appomattox Station, two miles from the Court House of that name.

On the morning of the ninth of April, Mackenzie's brigade, with orders to engage the enemy and develop his position, moved forward to the Lynchburg turnpike, about a mile west of Appomattox Court House, near which Lee's army lay. This movement placed the brigade directly across Lee's line of escape. Two divisions of the Twenty-fourth Corps, following the same route, were but two hours' march behind, and other troops were rapidly coming up. Lieutenant-Colonel Stratton having been ordered forward with his regiment, the Eleventh had the honor of opening the attack in the final battle of the war. The remainder of the brigade came in on the right. The enemy supposing that he had only cavalry to oppose him, determined to force his way through in the direction of Lynchburg, and for that purpose moved forward heavy lines of infantry to meet the attack, and sent a large force of cavalry from his right to gain the rear of the attacking force. Soon after the brigade became well engaged, and was beginning to be pressed by the strong flanking forces of the enemy, orders were received for the cavalry to fall back slowly to meet the supporting lines of the Twenty-fourth Corps. The command was therefore gradually withdrawn westerly along the main road. The enemy, anticipating an easy victory over the retiring force, advanced confidently, although once repulsed by the cavalry, now strengthened by Davies' brigade. This movement to the rear had continued but a few hundred yards, when Foster's division of the Twenty-fourth Corps emerged from the woods in the rear, in solid line of battle, and moving rapidly forward, swept back the enemy nearly a mile to the slope of the hill overlooking the Rebel main position, and there halted. Other bodies of troops came up rapidly into line, forty pieces of artillery were placed in position, and the cavalry was thrown out well on the left. In the valley below, only half a mile distant, lay the shattered and demoralized remnant of the main army of the rebellion, infantry, cavalry, artillery, and trains crowded together in confusion, surrounded on all sides, commanded by the guns, and completely at the mercy of the victorious army of the Union. While in this position, hostilities were suspended, the terms agreed upon, and the surrender took place.

The next day a squadron of the Eleventh, under Captain Elliott, found and took possession of fifty-four pieces of field artillery, with carriages and caissons, which the Rebels had buried at Red Oak Church, but had not included with the property surrendered. On the twelfth the brigade marched to Lynchburg, which had been evacuated by the enemy. The Eleventh Regiment took possession of the place, and a large amount of ordnance and other Rebel property, including fifty-six field-pieces, forty-one mortars, and six heavy guns. Leaving Lynchburg on the sixteenth, the command marched by the way of Burkesville to Richmond, where it arrived on the twenty-fourth.

In this short campaign the Eleventh Regiment took a conspicuous part. An immense amount of Rebel property fell into its possession. Including that at Red Oak Church and Lynchburg, it captured, took possession of, and delivered to the proper officers one hundred and ten field-pieces, forty-one mortars, six heavy guns, one hundred and twenty carriages and caissons, seven forges, and a large quantity of ammunition and other stores. Its losses were three officers killed and one captured (recaptured on the ninth), and twenty-five enlisted men killed and wounded.

On the sixth of May the regiment left Richmond on an expedition to Staunton, Virginia, where it arrived on the eleventh. Returning as far as Charlottesville, the regiment halted there on the sixteenth. Colonel Stratton was placed in command of the Sub-District of Albemarle, and several of the companies were detached for duty in the adjacent towns and counties, the remainder being stationed at Charlottesville.

Toward the close of July the regiment was ordered to Richmond for the purpose of being mustered out of service. It arrived there on the third of August, and went into camp near Manchester. On the thirteenth the muster for discharge took place, and the next day the regiment embarked on transports for Baltimore. At Fortress Monroe Company L rejoined the regiment, having arrived there from the Eastern Shore of Virginia. On the seventeenth the regiment passed through Philadelphia to Camp Cadwallader, where, two days later, it was discharged and paid. The officers and men then departed for their respective homes.

Thus terminated the career of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, after four years' honorable service in the great cause. Eighteen hundred officers and men have performed its field service. The bones of one hundred and twenty whiten the battle-fields of the South. One hundred and thirty have died in Union or Rebel hospitals. Twelve brave and gallant officers have laid down their lives in battle. A nation mourns the loss of these two hundred and fifty martyrs in the holy cause of liberty. Their surviving comrades will cherish their memory with sad yet fond remembrance; and the Great Republic will proudly honor those who, happily, have been permitted to return to their homes, witnessing the fruits of their toils and dangers. Brave Fallen! Rest in your glory! Honored Survivors! A grateful country greets you!
